Not illustrated. 1878 Excerpt: ...of-the situation of the Duchy, his own situation, and the chances of establishing a government and tranquillity. He told me that he had appointed his brother Prince William to be Governor-General, with unlimited powers and for an unlimited period of time. I endeavoured to make him feel that neither Prince William nor those whom he should call to his councils could venture to do all that was necessary to re-establish tranquillity and prosperity, nor would the people feel confidence or satisfaction in what should be done by the Prince, if he did not hold his appointment for a considerable time. He listened with attention to what I said; did not dissent from the reasoning upon which my proposition was founded, nor state any positive objection to the proposition itself. He asked whether it was certain that the Diet would refuse assistance. I answered that I thought it so probable as to be nearly certain: and that it was therefore absolutely necessary for his Serene Highness to take the step proposed if he wished to retain the sovereignty in his own person, and for his children, by stopping the revolution. Finding that I could make no farther progress yesterday, I took my leave, promising to have another interview with his Serene Highness in a few days. I have, &c, Wellington. Oct. 1830.
