Not illustrated. 1860 Excerpt: ...Guard and the artillery, from Burgos, taking the road of March 15 Aranda and the Somo-Sierra. On the same day, Dupont, with two divisions of his corps and the cavalry, broke up for the Guadarrama pass and the Escorial, by the route of Segovia; the third division of Dupont's corps remained at Valladolid to observe the Spanish troops which occupied Galicia. No sooner had these forces advanced on the roads towards Madrid, than their place at Burgos was supplied by the army of reserve under Bessieres. The whole body moved on by brigades, taking with them provisions for fifteen days, and fifty rounds of ball-cartridge each man; the troops bivouacked at night with all the precautions usual in an enemy's territory. They everywhere gave out that they were bound for the camp of San Roque, to act against the English, at the same time belying these pacific declarations by arresting all the Spanish soldiers and posts whom they met on the road, declare that my decree of 19th March, by which I abdicated the crown in favour of my son, is an act to which I was forced, to prevent the effusion of the blood of my beloved subjects. It should, therefore, be regarded as null.--See both documents in Foy, iiL 392, 393; Piieei Just. On the other hand, the day after his abdication, Charles IV. said to the diplomatic body assembled at the Escorial-- I never performed an action in my life with more pleasure. The truth appears to be, that the abdication, in the first instance, was prompted chiefly by terror for the life of the Prince of the Peace, for whose safety throughout the royal pair manifested more solicitude than for their own concerns; and it was an after-thought to protest against it as null, or attempt to recede from the act. Thibaudeau seems to incline to th...
