I had, however, in due rotation, the honour of being presented and of kissing the back of her Majesty's hand.... The bearing of Queen Charlotte certainly was not that of a heroine in romance; but she was the best bred and most graceful lady of her age and figure I ever saw, so kind and conciliating that one could scarcely believe her capable of anything but benevolence. She appeared plain, old, and of dark complexion; but she was unaffected, and commanded that respect which private virtues ever will obtain for public character. The year 1795 was chiefly spent by my colonel in weary dealings with the English War Office and the Irish Parliament. In that year his venerable mother died. She was certainly not very far from ninety years of age--probably about eighty-seven, as her eldest son was born in 1725, and she probably had married early, as the old custom was. Her daughter, Mrs. Seggerson, composed a beautiful keen over her, portions of which I have heard the venerable Miss Julianna OConnell recite in Irish and explain in English.¹ Mrs. Seggerson was herself an old woman, as she had been married more than fifty years before. She had early lost her husband, but had never married again, devoting herself to her children. She came to live with Maurice when his wife died. Lamenting the death of her mother, Alice Seggerson exclaimed--Mother of my heart! If you meet the good man of my house, Tell him since the day he left me I have found no pleasure in anything; No music raised my heart. Forgive me for bringing down any grief but yours; But tell him I find no pleasure in anything But his child. Since the voice of my...
