Excerpt: ... voice of imploring accent-- who knows will we ever meet again? Tis the last time, maybe, Ill ever look on him. I could hut press his hand to my heart; for my agitation increased the debility I felt, and every effort to speak was in vain. One half minit more--if its only that hell be able to say, God bless you, Darby, and Ill be happy. Push off, my lads, shouted the sailor, sternly; and as he spoke the oars plashed heavily in the sea, and the boat rocked over with the impulse. Twice the strong stroke of the oars sent the craft through the clear water, when the piper clasped his arms wildly around me, and kissing me on the cheek, sprung over the side. The waves were nearly to his shoulders; but in a few seconds he had buffeted through them, and stood upon the shore. With a last effort I waved my hand in adieu; and as I sank back exhausted, I heard a wild cry burst from him, half in triumph, half in despair. One glance more I caught of his figure as we stood out to sea; he was kneeling on the beach, bareheaded, and as if in prayer. The tears gushed from my eyes as I beheld him, and the long pent-up sorrow at last broke forth, and I sobbed like a child. Come, come, my lad, dont feel down-hearted, said the sailor, laying his hand on my shoulder. The world can scarce have been over rough to one so young as you are. Lift up your head, and see what a glorious morning we ve got; and there comes the breeze over the water. We hadnt such weather the last time we made this trip, I assure you. I looked up suddenly, and truly never did such a scene of loveliness meet my eyes. The sun had risen in all his glorious brilliancy, and poured a flood of golden light across the bay, tipping with a violet hue the far-off
