For fo large and fertile an ifland the number of inhabitants is but fmallj the whole, perhaps, not amounting to half a million; and of thofe net a third are in lubjection to the Spaniards. The capital, which was always called Manilla, is. feated at the mouth of a large river at the bottom of a bay, which is thirty leagues in circumference. The harbour is femicircular; in it fhips are fheltered from the fourth winds, but expoied to thofe from the north, unlefs they anchor very clofe to the fnore. Three or four hundred Indians were formerly employed in the docks, which have been fo much increafed within thefe few years, that men of war are now built there for Europe. Ever fince the Spaniards firft fettled in the Eaftand Weft-Indies, a traffic has been carried on Yol. V. X x between between Manilla and Mexico. About the month of July, a galleon annually fets out from the port of Manilla, which is commonly from one thoufand eight hundred to two thoufand tons burden. After getting clear of a multitude of iflands and rocks which delay its courfe, it fleers eaft north-eaft, in order to meet with the weft winds in thirty degrees latitude, which carry it in a frait courfe to Acapulco. This veffel, which is very heavy laden, is fix months on her paflage. Two fhips are frequently freighted in the year, one of which arrives at Manilla a month or two after the other has quitted it. The hoftile appearance of the Britifh fleet was the firft notice which the Spaniards received of a war having broke out between the two nations. The Philippine galleon, indeed, from Acapulco, had juft then appeared in the bay, and fhe brought the intelligence;
